Similarly a comparison of the higher and lower beaches of the Laurentian glacial lakes, which preceded the present Great Lakes, proves that the crustal uplift there was in progress and was nearly completed during the closing stages of the Ice Age. It is wholly inconsistent with these observations, made in contiguous parts of our continental area, to suppose that the country east of Lake Huron continued to retain a large part of its Late Glacial depression through 35,000 years after the departure of the ice there, and that only 3,500 years ago a large uplift there turned the drainage of the 3 upper lakes southward through Lake Erie, enlarging he Niagara river, and causing its erosion to attain the present relatively rapid rate. Before accepting the decisions of Spencer for the age of Niagara Falls, the reader should go over...
