So it is that we leave ignorance to direct the schools and poverty to tax itself to support them. The states supply neither adequate funds nor direction for the schools. Where education is most needed is just where the people do not appreciate it and will not exert themselves to provide it. It cannot be expected that a poor people will tax themselves for schools or that an ignorant people will know how to organize and direct them. We have yet to learn in the South that the state is the unit of education and must provide for its weakest members. The wealth of the country must educate its poor; the intelligence of the state must direct the schools. Our system of school legislation and management and our methods of school taxation improvement must be completely turned round before we can have anything like a system of efficient public schools. The school money must be raised to a larger extent from the state as a whole and be distributed more in accordance with the needs of the people. School management and supervision must be centralized to a considerable degree in the hands of representative and skilled experts. There should be a state board of education composed of the ablest educational authorities to be found, who should be responsible for all the public schools and should elect a state superintendent who should in turn have the fullest authority...
